A technique using the sublabial approach for endoscopic dacryocystorhinostomy is described. The new technique incorporates a different surgical approach, a better view of the lacrimal sac, a shorter operative time, a more rational way to select the incision plane, and a less invasive incision with a smaller chance of iatrogenic perforation. Besides, this technique saves surgical time and ensures a larger surgical space in the anterior maxillary sinus. A comparative study between the new technique and the classical Caldwell-Luc technique in terms of anatomical union is presented. Anatomical union is the key for successful postoperative results. The anatomic results of the new technique are equal to those of the classic technique, but the new technique offers several theoretical advantages. Thirty-five procedures were performed in 26 patients with nasolacrimal obstruction. Standard lacrimal endoscopy was used in all cases, and a disposable blade was used to cut an incision 4-5 mm wide in the midfacial area of the lacrimal sac, which is the most suitable location for an incision. The anterior maxillary sinus was cut, creating an adequate operative field for evaluation. With the new technique, no cases had intraoperative or postoperative complications, and anatomical union was achieved in all patients. The operative time was shorter than that of the classical technique. The sublabial approach using a disposable blade is a safe, effective, and reliable technique for endoscopic dacryocystorhinostomy. It is also an alternative to the classical technique.William of St. Amour William of St. Amour (1152–1216) was a French medieval
