To be accurate, the patient should be tested for Factor VIII coagulant activity at multiple time points. Factor VIII assay reagents are not available in all major hospital labs. If Factor VIII reagent is not available, physicians either need to forgo Factor VIII testing or conduct haemophilia A/B genotyping. For patients with normal factor VIII levels, routine Factor VIII genotyping is not required. Factor VIII assay reagents are also used by hemophilia centers, in academic medical centers and in the FDA registry. Assays for Factor VIII coagulant activity are often performed on platelets as they are highly enriched with factor VIII. Cases of hemophilia are rare, and research is centered on one or two patients in a clinical trial. These patients may be undergoing therapy, for example, and need their Factor VIII coagulant activity measured more than once a week. Assays to measure Factor VIII coagulant activity (FVIII:C) from plasma require purified Factor VIII antigen as the standard. The basic FVIII:C assay is described by Franklin in The Clinical Laboratory, 2nd Edition, Vol. 42, p. 30-40 (1983). This method is summarized in FIG. 6. Since Factor VIII coagulant activity in plasma is normally in the range of 0.5-2.0 Bethesda Units/ml, Factor VIII standard material should be greater than or equal to 50
