For further information, visit our official site., the government could simply stay in place until the mandates are completed, or until the mandates are repealed by executive order. In theory, this is the only way the law could be upheld. But it would be easier and cheaper for the government to comply with the law. Federal Judge Robert Hinkle ruled last week that employers must offer healthcare insurance to their employees starting on January 1, but the Trump administration is appealing that ruling to the Supreme Court. Its latest appeal argues that the mandate is unconstitutional because it doesn't give the government enough time to comply with the law. The administration has also indicated that it plans to set off and suspend the individual mandate—the part of the law that requires people to buy insurance—when it returns to its original form in 2018. As with the rest of the Affordable Care Act, the administration has indicated that it will try to take Obamacare down in stages. But with Congress looking like it won't agree to repeal and replace Obamacare before the election, and the Republican nominee making it clear that the law's mandates are unacceptable, that stage is now. How would all of these parts of Obamacare affect you? It depends. If the mandate is repealed, you'd still have to pay the fine for not having insurance. That fine would still go into effect on January 1. And if the employer mandate is repealed, so would the rest of the law. However, the rest of the law is pretty well set in stone right now, so those provisions would still be law. So, then, how would the repeal of individual mandates affect you? It would save you some money. You still pay the penalty, but you don't get the other benefits of the law. Here's a rundown of what you'd lose: As a general rule, healthy people will see their insurance
